Moving Downward in Seating Order

There was a large wedding party in progress in Mucur, a kaza town in Kırşehir Province. Many guests had been invited to that party, including the mayor of Kırşehir, the capital of Kırşehir Province. When the mayor of Kırşehir arrived at the party, the host gave him the seat of highest honor in the room.¹

As other guests arrived, the host asked each of them "Are you from Mucur or elsewhere?" If the guest was a resident of Mucur, he was placed in the seat of greatest honor, and the mayor of Kırşehir was required to move down one seat. Because almost all of the guests were local people, the mayor of Kırşehir was repeatedly asked to move down one seat, until he was finally sitting in the lowest seat in the room--right by the door.

When a dog wandered into the room, the mayor arose hastily and said to the dog, "Are you from Mucur? If you are, please take my seat." And to the others in the room, he said, "Farewell!"
